From the outset The Avengers were highly publicised, fashionably dressed, clean cut, well behaved every mother's sons. However behind the smiles, they were overworked, underpaid and struggling with the strict rules of engagement imposed by their management and record label. For close to five years they toured the country promoting their pop culture image and racking up the hits but management stipulated they weren't allow to hang around after the gigs to chat with the audience, and their income rarely constituted more than pocket money. Bass player Eddie McDonald died on Christmas Eve 2009 but producer Keith Newman caught up with the surviving members of The Avengers to capture their memories of life as 1960s pop culture commodities.
